Creating a legacy

The Davy Group's story is one that parallels Ireland and the country's economic development. At the turn of the last century, the Davy family name was associated with a chain of South Dublin pubs. The most famous of these establishments was J&T Davy, which was located in Portobello. In 1926, just a few years after Irish independence, brothers James and Eugene Davy created a new legacy for the Davy family when they moved away from the family business by establishing a stockbroking business, J&E Davy, with its first office located on Westmoreland Street, Dublin 2.

During the 30s, 40s, and 50s as the State gradually found its feet, the Davy brothers worked hard to build a solid, well-connected business network. While the core of the business was stockbroking, the brothers sat on the boards of many companies and organisations, guiding the economic landscape.

In the early 60s, their respective sons, Brian and Joseph, joined the business when the Irish economy was beginning to open up. With the new generation came new ideas and new opportunities, including the establishment of a dedicated research department in the late 60s and a shift in focus from private to institutional investors.

Wide-ranging financial services provider

Over the subsequent years and decades, through both organic growth and multiple acquisitions, the Davy Group has transformed from a purely stockbroking-focused firm into a wide-ranging financial services provider with diverse sets of clients both domestically and internationally.
